A tense is a way of indexing time relative to the time spoken or written. For example:

I write a letter to my sister. The letter leaves a week later.

Here, "write" and "leave" are both in the present tense. This means that the actions are happening now, or are being done while the sentence is spoken.

As the sentence is written, a tense is required to index the time at which the action (writing) is happening, relative to the time the sentence is written or read:

I am writing a letter to my sister. The letter leaves a week later.

Here, "am writing" specifies a present action, happening now or at the moment of writing or reading. There are additional tenses that index time in this way. In fact, the present tense can be used to refer to an action happening in the past, if we specify a time in the past relative to the time the sentence is written or read:

I wrote a letter to my sister. The letter left a week later.

Here, "wrote" is the past form of "write" and indexes the action relative to the time the sentence was written or read. However, there are also expressions of time in the present tense, called "present perfect" or "progressive" expressions, which index the present action relative to a past time or event:

I have written a letter to my sister. The letter left a week later.

Here, "have written" indexes an action starting in the past, at some point before now, and continuing up to now. The
"have" index is the present perfect form of "have" and indexes the action relative to the present time.

Another example of a present perfect expression is "have just written" which indexes an action starting in the past and continuing up to a time before now:

I have just written a letter to my sister. The letter left a week later.

Here, "have just written" indexes an action starting in the past, at some point before now, and continuing up to a time before now. The "have just" index is the present perfect form of "have just" and indexes the action relative to a time before now.

A tense may make within a discourse context. The book moves from a detailed exploration of the meaning and use of individual tenses to a thorough analysis of the way in which tenses can be seen to function together as sets, and finally to relative to one another to form temporally coherent discourse. Attention is paid to the relations between tenses. On the other hand, we can identify sets of tenses linked to particular temporal areas such as the past or the future. These sets of tenses are related to one another by their temporal overlap or by their temporal separation. On the one hand, there are many contexts in which speakers might in theory
